

Alfie Sherwin: Deputy Head Boy

I feel privileged to have been given such a prestigious role at Jo Richardson.

I am very much in love with the wildlife around us. I love every creature, some more than others and try to intertwine my everyday life with animals in unimaginable ways such as in English writing metaphors in exams about creatures. my favourite animal is an odd choice but aside from obscurity i have stuck to my likes and the aardvark stays at the top of the list for me.

Ever since i was about three years old, everyone knew that i would have become a person who would take an interest in animal based jobs. this is evident from my massive collection of plastic animals, stuffed animals and the pictures of animals i used to have on the wall. In upcoming years though I have been able to narrow down what my intentions would be after schooling. This has come to me doing a degree in palaeontology and going on to be a palaeontologist in later life.

At Jo Richardson school i have collect a few achievements under my wing. Things such as three golden seagulls, various trips to many places and of course deputy head boy. It never became apparent to me that i would achieve such goals. but as i grew in person, i likewise grew in mentality and have become who i really am. I have been led to this stage throughout the school through growth mindset and also brilliant opportunities throughout.

Jo Richardson is a forever growing school and also is a very rewarding facility and has been a pleasure to work in for the past five years.
